The walking city was mankind's answer to these transport problems. People collocated to be together for activities they considered important and for which transportation was too slow and too cumbersome. In turn, they planned and arranged their cities around the general principle of avoiding cumbersome general transportation, both in terms of the necessary number of trips and the length of these trips. Such marks of the modern city as one-way streets, limited-access roads, or land-consuming road interchanges would have been an anathema to the city planners of the pre-motorized era. Consciously or unconsciously, the planners and builders of the walking cities searched for circulation patterns that assured access for the most essential functions by travelling the least distance. At first glance, a medieval town with its crooked streets may seem an inefficient design. However, if we look more carefully, the crooked street patterns suggest a circle with radial spokes and circumferential routes. When the town is on or against a hill, the crookedness may result from squeezing as many dwellings into the hillside as possible with the least cutting and filling. To cut and fill, the joy of modern architects and contractors, requires extensive transportation. The earth must be moved hither and yon. This is a backbreaking task if the tools are limited to pick, shovel, wheelbarrow and animal-drawn carts.

- i- State in your own words the planners of the walking city had in mind when they tried to avoid the cumbersome internal transportation.
- ii- Explain in your own words the meaning of 'cutting' and 'filling' as used in the passage.
- iii- Why were cutting and filling avoided by the builders of the walking city?
- iv- Why, do you think, does the writer describe the city as 'the walking city'?
- v- Give in your own words and as briefly as you can the meaning of 'anathema', 'the pre-modernized era' and 'circumferential routes'.
